“ Denise,

My condolences to you and yours. Scott will be sorely missed.

I was a fan of his work before I met him and enjoyed working with him at SFF and on the air after I did. The Avatar Trilogy was a personal favorite, introducing me to the Forgotten Realms.

My thoughts are with you.

“ Scott was, apart from being a phenomenal author and a huge icon in YA literature with an impressive bibliography, a man with a heart as deep as the ocean. Three years ago, when I decided to start writing, I reached out through the business network for anyone who might be willing to help me. I didn't expect someone of Scott's talent, track record and gravitas to respond. But that was Scott. Never too big to reach down and give a little person a helping hand.

Without abandon he offered me everything he knew. He mentored me through the gruelling early days of learning the craft, he spent hours and hours with me explaining the industry. He asked me to partner with him on a mystery series, and we started creating together, writing a whole new world and producing an amazing book which we eventually sold to S&S Gallery under the penname LJ Oliver.

We sat together for hours only a week ago, plotting the next book, planning our social strategy, and laughing heartily. I still don't feel awake to this sad, sad truth that he is gone.

Scott was a man who shared and shared and gave and gave. His legacy is not in the many wonderful books he wrote, but in the lives he awakened, and the people who are who they are because of his kindness.

Even though he is gone too soon, and even though he had so many stories left to write, I know he left our world feeling fulfilled. He met his soulmate Denise 20 years ago and was as in love with her now as he ever was. He shared his life with his one true love, and he knew it every second. His wife Denise was his sea, his ship, his compass and his anchor, and he was happy. It gives me such comfort to know that this was how he left.

Scott, thank you for everything: your insights, your help, your endless patience and humor, your friendship and your love.

Good luck on your next adventure, and till we meet again. Elizabeth

Thank you, Elizabeth for your lovely words. Scott loved working with you and was looking forward to watching you grow into an amazing writer which I'm sure you will be.
